Visible Learning, Visible Learners

The Power of Group Learning and Documentation in Classrooms and Communities

Mara Kretchevsky

Research Director, Making Learning Visible, Project Zero, Harvard Graduate School of Education, Cambridge MA

The work of Reggio Emilia, Italy has drawn international attention to children's capacities as individual and group learners. Documenting children's learning through notes, photographs, video, and student work supports learning and collaboration for children as well as adults, and challenges our assumptions about children's capabilities. This presentation explores the power of the group as a learning environment and documentation as a way to shape and make visible how and what we learn. Through examples of documentation of learning groups from Italian and U.S. classrooms, we will address questions such as: "When does a group become a learning group?" and "How do observing and documenting learning change the nature of that learning?"
